He could get no answer to his knocks and the people in the store had told him his mother had gone upstairs a quarter of an hour before, with the two men following her.

HER BED.

Mrs. Ikelstein let the boy go through her flat to the fire-escape and thus into his own home. His entrance was followed with a shrick of horror which echoed through the whole neighborhood. A moment later the boy burst into the hall with his eyes starting from his head. He led Mrs. Ikelstein and others who came running into the halls into his mother's bedroom off the dining-room.

Mrs. Marienta lay on her bed face down. Her hands and feet were bound together by strips of torn bed clothing. Her head had been deeply cut. She was unconscious. Her large diamond carrings, four diamond rings and a sum of money which she carried in her dress were all missing.

With young Pelliciaro, Mrs. Ikelstein ran out to the street. At Madison and Catharine streets they found Policeman Gates and Detectives Maher and Mc-Carthy, Gates telephoned to Hudson Street Hospital while the detectives ran back to the house with the woman and the boy. They found that the woman had been strangled by men whose finger nails had torn her throat and ripped great gashes through her cheeks. Dr. Orr. who came from the hospital, said that Mrs. Marienta was quite dead, although her body was still warm.
